STATEMENT OF WORK

TITLE: Evaluation of COP17 and outlook of the climate debates

Objectives

From November 28 to December 11, 2011, the 17th Conference of the Parties (COP17) of the United Nations Framework Convention Climate Change took place in Durban, South Africa's third largest city. This was an important meeting, which would address the question of what direction the world's countermeasures against global warming would take starting in 2013, following the expiration of the first commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol. As a result of COP17, an agreement was somehow reached on a second commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol and international society also agreed on a promise for a subsequent legally binding next framework.

Japan, however, along with Russia and Canada, has not signed on for the second commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol and, from 2013 onwards, no longer bearing a legal duty to reduce emissions, will now make voluntary efforts.

While the continuation of a global climate change agreement has been secured, there is still no prospect for attaining the goal of holding the rise of global temperatures to less than two degrees Celsius above preindustrial levels. It is expected that if this goal of "less than two degrees" is not met, the world will face a wide variety of negative impacts from climate change.

The Kyoto Protocol was created for the resolution of this issue; what does it mean that, starting in 2013, Japan will not be legally obligated to reduce greenhouse gases? Also, what sort of debate will take place regarding the treaty to follow the Kyoto Protocol (the next framework)? It is desirable that the US, an economic power, take a leadership role in forming an international framework for resolving these issues; but negotiations have stalled, and in the current climate where economic issues have taken precedence, debate on climate change in the United States is stagnant.

Going forward, as representatives of developed nations, and also to be able to build a Japan-U.S. alliance, it is important to gain an understanding of the direction of the debate within the United States. It is with this background that JETRO asks Contractor to carry out a survey with the following content.

Scope of Work

- Outlook for the Durban Platform
- Prospects for the establishment of the Green Climate Fund
- Prospects for realization and implementation of the Cancun Agreements
- Outlook for U.S. environmental policy
